

The excavations uncovered a total of eight hollows that would have formed the principal below-ground element of what are called sunken-fretted buildings, these being the smaller buildings shown here. It seems probable that the shallower evidence for the larger post-built structures that are most prominent in the image was lost through truncation before archaeological work began. Discovetes do not always rely on new excavations, and – in addition to advances made in place-name studies – re-assessment of selected material has produced revelations on such aspects as the dating or provenance of assemblies. Descriptions in a Coroner's Report from 1951 of an isolated burial at Compton were recently re-assessed for its suggestively Saxon features, while examination of the records from the Guildown site – first published by WGC Lowther in 1931 – have drawn-out discrepancies in various details.

Excavations at Guildown cemetery by TVAS (Thames Valley Archaeological Services) under-provided dates of AD 663–721 and irretrievable Saxon presence – mainly pig – recovered in test pitting carbon dates from an assemblage of animal bones – mainly deer – recovered in test pitting

With the development of more scientific techniques, identities formed through a variety of processes.

Studies are also complicated by issues of ethnicity and religion, and it clear that rather than notions of mass migration or simple Christianity, of pagan practices, identities formed through a variety of processes.

Where can I discover more?

Surrey lacks many notable Saxon remains which are still standing and can be viewed today, as most excavated sites are now re-buried with little to see on the ground. However, various Saxon barrow earthworks can still be seen in the landscape, as at Banstead or (albeit less so) Farthing Downs. Although a small number of parish churches may boast Saxon foundations, the only one with particularly pre-Norman features in its fabric is St Mary's in Guildford.

In addition to the Society's own handling collections and teaching resources, local loans boxes are available from many of the county's museums, as well as Surrey History Centre.

Saxon exhibits can be viewed at local museums including Guildford, Godalming and Kingston, and the Museum of London, Sutton Hoo, Ashmolean and other churches in the region including Worth and Sompting are also worth a visit.

Christians and Pagans

The fall of Rome and coming of the Saxons

By c. AD 700, the conversion to Christianity was mostly complete, and charters record minster churches at Farnham and Chertsey. Few churches today retain Saxon fabric, other than foundations as at Farnham (far left), though St Mary's, Guildford has features such as plaster strips and double-splayed windows which date to the late 10th or 11th century. Although the Vikings' arrival in the late 8th century re-introduced paganism, their impact was not as strong in Surrey, with only a handful of finds including the Chertsey sword – an offering recovered from the Thames (bottom right) – and Tilford axe. artefacts for sites. At Flexford, however, a rare coin struck in the Mediterranean A.D 408-23 (right, showing Honorius and Theodosius II) attests to continued use of the Roman road at the site. Despite continental accounts for Roman withdrawal in 410 and the subsequent arrival of the Angles, Saxons and Jutes, the earliest English sources – including Bede's Anglo-Saxon Chronicle – are not contemporary with the events described and should not be taken at face value. Early domestic settlement

Most of Surrey's Early Saxon sites – including those within the historic county – have suffered from poor quality antiquarian excavations and a lack of closely dateable artefacts. As structures were built out of timber they are rarely uncovered, and only a small number of 5th and 6th century sunken-featured buildings – also referred to as grubenhäuser – are known, including one at Hurst Park, Shepperton and Farnham (left). These would have usually formed a complex incorporating at least one rectangular hall and although many were later re-used as middens domestic artefacts such as loomweights (as from Farnham, left) indicate specialist functions.

Pagan burials and sacred sites

As who first arrived were pagan – rather than Christian – their remains often contained in ceramic urns (left), furnished grave goods (such as beads and brooches as in the 6th century ions (right)), more intricate items such as the Watersmeet (le right) or weapons as in the early 6th century warrior burial (bottom left)), or mixed rite. Occasional placenames – such as God Thunor – also attest to former sacred places. From the later 6th and 7th century, barrows were raised over particularly high status burials, as at Farthing Down, which was accompanied by a wooden cup with bronze bindings (upper right).
